Second Regular Session

HOUSE BILL NO. 7090

Introduced by Honorable Mark O. Go

EXPLANATORY NOTE

The city of Baguio is celebrated as among the country’s premier tourist spots as it offers sojourners an experience unalike most other destinations across the country. Known as the “City of Pines”, Baguio has fostered an image of harmony in nature, culture, climate, and progress through the imposing walls of Benguet pine growing throughout the city.

The distinct scent, together with the iconic silhouette of the pine tree has become synonymous with the city itself. The tree has for so long embodied the solid bond between the residents of Baguio and the local natural environment. This identity however, is currently being threatened by urban expansion.

Currently, only about a quarter of the city’s entire territory is left with forest and green cover. A recent inventory, as ordered by DENR Secretary Roy Cimatu, revealed that the City of Pines has only 2.5 million trees left, and of these, only less than 500,000 are Benguet pine.

Apart from serving as the quintessential branding tool for the city’s tourism efforts, ecological considerations would call for more radical responses to the city’s dwindling forest stock. Given the city’s natural topography and its growing urban land use, many areas across the city are susceptible to landslides induced by earthquakes or heavy rainfall. With fewer trees to prevent or mitigate such hazards, residents are continuously under the threat of losing priceless lives and millions of pesos worth in damages to properties. The decimation of local forest stock further leads to water insecurity due to degradation and poor management of watersheds, food insecurity due to soil erosion, destruction of indigenous cultures and serious threat to local biodiversity.

Ultimately, the tree stock of Baguio, particularly the Benguet pine, is an environmental heritage passed on through generations, which demands the strongest protection for its cultural, economic, social, and ecological values. Consistent with both national and local governments’ campaign for sustainable development, an imposed moratorium on the cutting of trees in Baguio city for a period of ten (10) years, would facilitate local progress without sacrificing the needs of future generations of Baguio residents. Over the next decade, the said moratorium will allow the rehabilitation of the city’s tree stock, and will display the creativity and resourcefulness of the local government and the real estate industry in incorporating the tree stock in the design of the city and its development plan.

The constitutionally protected right to a healthful and balanced ecology must be enjoyed not only by the preceding generations but by future generations as well. Millions of Filipinos all over the country treasure a shared experience of Baguio that they knew of, the image of the city they grew up with, and the local environment that made their every summer memorable and special. For this reason preserving the country’s “City of Pines” is a concern of national significance.

In view of the forgoing, the immediate consideration and approval of this measure is earnestly sought.
