EXPLANATORY NOTE

In 2007 to 2013, the Philippines was reported to have the second highest female adult mortality rate in the Southeast Asian region, at 144 persons per 1,000 population. In addition to this, the maternal mortality ratio in the country is alarmingly high at 117 per 100,000 live births (2014), a far cry from the 2015 Philippine Millennium Development Goal of 52 per 100,000 live births.

The United States of America established the Office of Research on Women's Health (ORWH) at the National Institute of Health in September 1990 in order "to strengthen, develop, and increase research on diseases, disorders, and conditions that are unique to, more prevalent among, or more serious in women, or for which there are different risk factors for women than for men."¹

The researches undertaken by the ORWH has found that sex and gender identity play crucial roles in health, wellness, and disease progression. Thus, the strides in women's health research may lead to the development of medication specifically tailored for both sexes.

It is the policy of the State to protect and promote the right to health of every Filipino. Given the dynamic roles that Filipino women play in the society and the numerous risks on their health and well-being, it is imperative that we adopt the best practices of developed countries and find ways to address issues on health.

This bill seeks to establish the Office of Research on Women's Health in the Philippines.

In view of the foregoing, the passage of this bill is earnestly sought.
